The purpose of this study was to examine the quality of preventive care knowledge among US medical students before and after exposure to a prevention training curriculum. Before the curriculum, the authors surveyed medical students at all four institutions in their training program. After the curriculum, the authors surveyed the same students again, administering the same preventive care questionnaire. Analyses included descriptive statistics, the Wilcoxon signed-rank test, and a general linear model. Before the curriculum, nearly all surveyed students were aware of individual preventive services. After the curriculum, the survey mean scores remained largely unchanged, and the students' awareness of health-related resources remained high. The Wilcoxon signed-rank test indicated no statistically significant improvement in mean scores for preventive care knowledge ($P = .22$, two-tailed). Results were similar for females and males, by institution, and based on students' self-reported prior preventive care knowledge. Exposure to a prevention training curriculum did not improve medical students' knowledge of preventive services, although students were generally already aware of these services and of health-related resources in the same domains. Given the high prevalence of poor preventive care, these results should not be interpreted as evidence of no improvement in preventive care knowledge. Students were more knowledgeable about the availability of preventive care prior to completing the curriculum, suggesting that prior knowledge of preventive care resources may be a barrier to its application. There is value in educating medical students about the resources available for preventive care. This value can be provided in multiple ways, such as in an interactive program focused on improving disease prevention or in traditional lecture-based curricula.
